WELLINGTON. Today (NZPA). — A new professional position — officer for continuing education — is to be created in the Department of Education, the Minister of Education, Mr Amos, said yesterday.

"This move reflects the emphasis which the Government has placed on tertiary or continuing education," the Minister said.

The new position would be a focal point for new initiatives which had been undertaken by the department in the field of continuing education.

The officer would co-ordinate policy advice in a number of developing fields, including further use of schools, particularly secondary schools, for continuing education.

The position is to be advertised this week.

ART GALLERY
A large portrait of the Mayor of Shrewsbury, England, painted in 1841, has been given to the Govett-Brewster Art Gallery, New Plymouth, by a former resident, Mrs Joan Marshall.

The portrait was painted by D. Langley and the director, Mr R. H. Ballard, is writing to the Shrewsbury Museum, where there is a duplicate of the painting, to find out more about the painter and his subject, William Hazeldine Austin.

He had no idea of the value of the painting at the moment, but there was some damage, including two holes in the canvas. When the gallery knew more about the portrait a decision would be made about its restoration.

$85,000 church at Pungarehu

Pungarehu's new $85,000 Catholic Church will be opened early next month.

Only landscaping and a few minor touches are needed to complete the work on St Martin's, which began just before last Christmas.

The church will seat about 320 and will be opened by the Archbishop of Wellington, Cardinal McKeefry, on August 5. Sixty parishioners will be confirmed at the first Mass and priests born in the area will attend the opening.

The new building (shown below) replaces the old St Martin's built in 1908. Its parish extends from Rahotu to Pungarehu.

Marsh experienced a second attack of giddiness. When he felt better he consulted some medical textbooks in the university library. But medicine was not his field. Wisely, he decided to consult a doctor.

So in my surgery he said: "I gather most attacks of giddiness may be the result of some disturbance of our inner ear which is the seat of our balancing mechanism. Am I right, doctor?"

Often some ailment of the inner ear is to blame. For instance, there is a condition called benign postural vertigo where the giddiness is triggered off by sudden movements of the head.

"Move your head sharply," I instructed.

"To the right or to the left?" the professor asked pedantically.

MOVEMENTS

"Any way you like," I said. Sudden movements did not produce giddiness in his case, so benign postural vertigo, a condition of unknown origin where the balancing mechanisms in the ear are disturbed, was not to blame.
